If the Amateur Radio Service is to maintain its status as a national communication network of last resort, it is critical that some form of Morse Code licensing requirement be maintained. It is far easier to construct Morse Code equipment than, say, single sideband or digital equipment. Morse Code is far easier to send and understand over long distances and under field conditions than are other modes. In the final analysis this is a national security issue and should be treated as such.